Preparing for a career in politics is three parts luck and one part planning. No matter how much you plan, political success is all about having personality attributes like ambition and shrewdness, and you also have to be in the right place at the right time. Some undergraduate degrees, however, prepare you for a career in the political arena better than others.

The law calls this constructive dismissal. Constructive dismissal happens when your employer does something that: changes things at work for you in a major way, is not something you should have expected, and; you don't agree to or accept it. When this happens, it's like you've been fired. So if you leave the job, you have the same rights as if you were fired. This includes the right to ...
