Sonia Delaunay's exploration of expressive color in the field of textile design differentiates her significantly from other members of the contemporary avant-garde. Besides designing, making, and selling garments in her own fashion boutique, she was responsible for costume design in a range of the performing arts including theatre and dance. She ended up creating a line of textiles so significant that it was picked up by one of the biggest fabric manufacturers in Europe.

Her abstract textiles and graphics, and the jazz-age clothing she designed, helped define art deco. For decades, this expatriate supported herself, her son and husband, French cubist painter Robert Delaunay, portrayed here as a hopelessly impractical enfant terrible. At age 67, after restoring her late husband's eclipsed reputation, she broke out of his orbit to experiment with form and color. In this gossipy, wonderfully evocative biography, Madsen, biographer of Malraux and ...

The Lost Generation was the social generational cohort that came of age during World War I. "Lost" in this context refers to the "disoriented, wandering, directionless" spirit of many of the war's survivors in the early postwar period. The term is also particularly used to refer to a group of American expatriate writers living in Paris during the 1920s.

According to Axel Madsen in Sonia Delaunay: Artist of the Lost Generation, "The cover for Pâques à New York began Sonia's career as a designer of book covers." When the poet completed another very long poem, she and Cendrars collaborated on yet another poetry-as-design project. According to Madsen this prose-poem—moving from poetry to prose—was something new and Terk-Delaunay ...

Sonia Terk Delaunay settled in Paris in 1905, met and married Robert Delaunay in 1910, and joined with him in the development of Orphism, a movement based in Cubism but determined to bring new lyricism and color to the rather severe works of Picasso and Braque. During the 1920s, she focused upon bringing this new artistic lyricism into the world of high fashion, transforming fabrics for fashion ...

Sonia Delaunay died in 1979, just as she was directing the completion of this edition of her deck of cards. Her long life proved, ultimately, as joyous as her art, as vibrant in its color as it was revolutionary in its composition. Born Sarah Stern, she lived most of her life with neither of the names she had been given, taking her uncle's surname, Terk, and the name Sofia, or its Russian form ...
